

El Recobro, Mexico City

In a relatively well off society, handicapped children and children with learning disabilities are generally well cared for, usually at home within their family. However, in some places of the world, these children are often abandoned by their families due to the added costs, time and resources needed to ensure they are properly cared for. As a result, the children become society outcasts and they end up homeless living on the street.

Within the vast landscape of the western hemisphere's largest city is a small orphanage known as El Recobro. Their mission is to rescue as many children from the streets as their facility will hold and provide shelter, food, clothing and education to those unable to help themselves.

GreatLife 4 All has supported El Recobro by providing VIDACELL for the residents, workers and volunteers of this orphanage. "It's encouraging to see the life changing improvements that are being made in the lives of these less fortunate people who would otherwise be destined to a life of misery," says GreatLife President & Founder Gregg Sturz. "We are just trying to do our part."
